

New U.S. Hotels That Top Our Travel Wish List

By Jennifer Flowers 8.1.2018 From the September/October 2018 issue

Courtesy of Christian Harder

Detroit's Siren Hotel has repurposed the 1926 Wurlitzer Building, which had been long abandoned.

These hotels are bringing a fresh vibe to six U.S. cities.

A wellness oasis in Manhattan. A revitalized landmark in Detroit. A retreat with a cause in Chicago. These new hotels—six in all—are located in some of our favorite U.S. cities, and they're all at the top of our travel go-list this year. And while they're vastly different, what each property offers is a fresh perspective on its destination. Take the Proper Hotel, a newcomer to San Francisco that aims to revitalize the run-down Mid-Market neighborhood, with its Kelly Wearstler-designed guest rooms and its buzzy rooftop bar. Or the Sagamore Pendry Baltimore 🏨, which took the city's historic Recreation Pier and turned it into a coveted place to stay. And then there's the Waldorf Astoria Beverly Hills 🏨, which has managed to up the ante on luxury in an L.A. neighborhood already known for glamour. Read on for a closer look at the new U.S. hotels worth putting on your travel radar.

Courtesy of St. Jane

Get your art deco fix at St. Jane Chicago.

Chicago

St. Jane Chicago

The St. Jane is named after Jane Addams, the Nobel Peace Prize winner who pioneered social reform in Chicago at the turn of the 20th century. A biography of Addams sits on a nightstand in every one of the hotel's 365 guest rooms, and the owners—both female—donate a percentage of their profits to the Jackson Chance Foundation, whose mission is to enrich the lives of babies in the neonatal intensive care unit at Ann & Robert H. Lurie Children's Hospital. Beyond feeling good about where your dollars are going, there are plenty of other reasons to stay at the St. Jane: It's located in the Carbide & Carbon Building, a 1929 art deco landmark shaped like a champagne bottle; guest rooms are outfitted with large windows and marble countertops; and it's just five blocks from the city's Millennium Park 🏢. From $269—L.I.